Should Pastors Be Available All the Time?

Warrick R. Long
Avondale College of Higher Education, warrick.long@avondale.edu.au

Peter Williams
Avondale College of Higher Education, peter.williams@avondale.edu.au

Recommended Citation

Should pastors be available all the time?

In contrast to the idyllic notion of spending days in quiet contemplation, secluded from interruptions while preparing sermon series months ahead of time, the modern-day pastor operates in a world where days (and nights) more often are spent dealing with the busyness of pastoral duties—visitation, phone calls, meetings, and crisis intervention. New technology, such as social media and email, has created the expectation of being accessible “everywhere, all the time.”

Has this perpetual connectivity assisted the pastor in balancing work commitments or just added additional pressure? We surveyed Seventh-day Adventist (SDA) church pastors in Australia to understand the impact of work email on their work-life balance.

This article concentrates on our findings.

A biblical balance

Though a number of such studies have been conducted on the impact of email and the general population, to date no one has explored it within the SDA pastoral context. We felt it important to consider this issue in light of the additional expectation for ministers to espouse and model a “healthy” balanced lifestyle. After all, there are clear biblical principles for doing so (see following table).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Text</th>
<th>Action</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Genesis 2:3</td>
<td>God completes creation and rests</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Exodus 20:8–11</td>
<td>Commandment to rest on Sabbath and do no work</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Psalm 46:10</td>
<td>Being still</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mark 1:35; 3:13; 6:31, 32</td>
<td>Jesus seeking a time of solitude</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luke 10:42</td>
<td>Martha being admonished to cease work for a time</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Ellen White was concerned with this issue and counseled pastors and other workers to “come out against intemperance of every kind,—intemperance in working, in eating, in drinking and in drudging.”3 She also made it clear that the “labor of the day should not be prolonged into the evening,”4 and workers are not to “try to crowd into one day the work of two.”5

Many contemporary writers have written extensively on the issue of work-life balance;6 a particularly topical subject for researchers and commentators,7 yet little has been published that explores this issue in the context of the Christian pastor and, in particular, SDA pastors.

Results

In 2014, we surveyed SDA pastors in Australia in order to investigate the impact of work email on their lives and levels of work-life balance. A representative sample of 78 local church pastors completed the survey. An overwhelming majority (89 percent) indicated they own some sort of mobile device (e.g., smartphone, tablet) that allowed them to check their work emails at any time. A surprising 98.7 percent indicated that they check their work emails when not at work. More than one-third (34.6 percent) of participants indicated they check their emails “a few times a day.” Almost one out of every four pastors (24.4 percent) checked their emails “once a day” when not at work.

The survey participants were asked at what times of the day they check their work emails. The results were that 23.1 percent access their emails before breakfast, 30.8 percent access emails in the evening, 61.5

MAY 2016 | Ministry® 13
percent check at various times of the day, and 20.5 percent of local church pastors acknowledge that they check work-related emails when on vacation.

Why check work emails when not at work?

We explored more deeply why pastors check their work emails when not at work. We found that 34.6 percent indicated they “like to know what is happening”; 35.9 percent said that “it helps me manage things when I go back to work on paid time.” Another 10.3 percent “enjoyed being connected to work all the time,” and notably, almost one out of four local church pastors (24.4 percent) specified that “work is an important part of who I am.”

Is work email an intrusion?

In response to a question asking how participants feel about having their work email available to them all the time, 53.8 percent of pastors indicated that they found it to be “helpful.” In fact, 37.2 percent of respondents recognized that having work email available to them all the time made their work more “efficient.” Only 16.7 percent identified it as “a distraction,” and 7.7 percent found it “tiring.” Respondent comments such as, “Both, helpful in work times though intrusive when ‘clocked out,’” recognized the need for balance. A number of participants commented that they found it “necessary,” and one stated: “Now that emails can be accessed at all hours, employers can tend to forget that there are times when it is ‘tools down.’ . . . I wish we could ‘switch off’ and not have the constant intrusion.”

To what extent have you seen an increase in work-related emails?

Our study found that 38.5 percent of responding pastors identified that in their time in the workplace they had experienced either a “significant” or “substantial” increase in work-related emails. A further 24.4 percent of respondents noted “somewhat” of an increase.
Work-life balance

Five questions in the survey measured the degree to which work is perceived by respondents as interfering with nonwork activities, such as time spent with family, community engagement, or personal time.

The first of these questions asked survey participants to indicate how often their work interfered with their ability to develop or maintain connections and friendships in their various communities (see figure 1). A staggering 73.4 percent of local church pastors indicated “sometimes,” “often,” or “almost always” as being their perceived extent of interference. This percentage increased to three out of four among respondents aged 45 years and older. Of those who indicated they had seen a “significant” or “substantial” increase, comments often identified both a negative and a positive side to this increase. There appeared to be a recognition of increased email as a result of where technology now resides in society, as well as how this can improve communication. But comments such as, “I think there are too many ways to connect. It feels like it’s hard to get a break. But what can you do about it?” or “I’ve started to switch all communications off when with family, but this has been met by quite scathing remarks from administrators”; or “I feel the need to limit the number of emails that get to me” are indicative of the identified problems the increase of work emails can cause.

Other comments, including “It is what it is!” or “Deal with it—part of modern life,” demonstrate a silent resignation of the increased number of work-related emails. One pastor stated: “I do often feel that it is near impossible to keep on top of all the emails as well as do face-to-face ministry as much as I’d like. I get into trouble a bit from some members who think I should be more focused on keeping all my email correspondence up-to-date and organized.”

Would pastors be supportive of employers restricting work-related emails outside of traditional (9:00 a.m.–5:00 p.m.) work hours?

Of the valid responses to this question, 23.1 percent of pastor respondents indicated they would support their employer restricting access to work-related emails outside of work hours. The remaining 60.3 percent indicated they would not be supportive. Comments such as “I control when I choose to review my emails after hours,” or “I should be empowered to control that aspect of my life myself,” or “I have the choice to open work emails or not” reflect a belief that the individual reserves the right to access these work emails at any time.

Of those who indicated they had seen a “significant” or “substantial” increase, comments often identified both a negative and a positive side to this increase. There appeared to be a recognition of increased email as a result of where technology now resides in society, as well as how this can improve communication. But comments such as, “I think there are too many ways to connect. It feels like it’s hard to get a break. But what can you do about it?” or “I’ve started to switch all communications off when with family, but this has been met by quite scathing remarks from administrators”; or “I feel the need to limit the number of emails that get to me” are indicative of the identified problems the increase of work emails can cause.

Other comments, including “It is what it is!” or “Deal with it—part of modern life,” demonstrate a silent resignation of the increased number of work-related emails. One pastor stated: “I do often feel that it is near impossible to keep on top of all the emails as well as do face-to-face ministry as much as I’d like. I get into trouble a bit from some members who think I should be more focused on keeping all my email correspondence up-to-date and organized.”

Would pastors be supportive of employers restricting work-related emails outside of traditional (9:00 a.m.–5:00 p.m.) work hours?

Of the valid responses to this question, 23.1 percent of pastor respondents indicated they would support their employer restricting access to work-related emails outside of work hours. The remaining 60.3 percent indicated they would not be supportive. Comments such as “I control when I choose to review my emails after hours,” or “I should be empowered to control that aspect of my life myself,” or “I have the choice to open work emails or not” reflect a belief that the individual reserves the right to access these work emails at any time.
point out that working at unsocial or nonstandard times is associated with high work-life interference; the pastors’ responses explored in this survey data keenly point out that these hours reflect the experience of many ministers.

Summary
In this study a significant number of pastors indicated their work interferes with developing and maintaining friendships and with their out-of-work activities. Their work keeps them from spending desired time with family and friends. Most pastors feel rushed or pressed.

Yet more than half of the pastors surveyed feel satisfied with their work-life balance. This raises some interesting questions. Further research is needed to discern what is behind this incongruity, because the implications are that many pastors are not living and modeling balanced lives and are not establishing important nurturing relationships.

The comments by pastors surveyed also indicate there could be a number of reasons for this that go beyond personal time-management practices, including a begrudging acceptance of what they feel cannot be changed, while attempting to make the best of their situation. Others indicated the risk of “missing out” on something important or receiving criticism for not being continually accessible outweighed the potential negatives of the relationship aspects of their situation. Several other comments imply the pastors have difficulty in defining clear boundaries between work and nonwork time, or that these boundaries are not recognized and honored by others. These suggest a potential for a culture of unhealthy employment practices, which, left unaddressed, has consequences for future generations of pastors.

Conclusion
There is clear counsel in both biblical and extrabiblical sources that pastors should be striving for and modeling a balanced life. However, our survey of Australian SDA pastors indicates a significant number of them are not achieving this balance. Further research may reveal the major causes of this imbalance, potentially enabling strategies that may alleviate the associated problems.

5 Ellen G. White, Gospel Workers (Hagerstown, MD: Review and Herald Pub. Assn., 1915), 244.
6 See e.g., Henry Blackby and Richard Blackby, Spiritual Leadership (Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman, 2001); Stephen Covey, The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People (Victoria, Australia: The Business Library, 1992); and Gordon MacDonald, Ordering Your Private World (Victoria, Australia: Strand, 2001).
9 Skinner and Pocock, The Persistent Challenge.